WHEN WE SPILL A DRINK, there are people telling us we've had enough, harsh words are traded and cabs are called. When the good folks at BevShots.com spill a drink, they photograph it under a microscope and sell it as art.

BevShots is a new site selling sofa- and bedroom-sized images mashing art and science into trippy, vaguely lava lamp/velvet painting/Frazetta/fractal images (perfect over your vintage Italo Fontana Hand Chair). The images originally appeared on neckties via Florida State professor Michael Davidson's Molecular Expressions' "Cocktail Collections." BevShots founder Lester Hunt saw an opportunity and bought the images and names from the professor and you...

The site's designers take various imbibables—beers, wines, cocktails and sodas—throw them under a polarizing microscope and turn the image into a poster or on canvas as a gallery wrap. Then you choose the border and orientation coordinating with your decor, and savor the conversations that start as people try and figure out which tossed nippie is splashed up colorfully on your wall.

BevShots currently offers 29 images, including Australian Pale Lager, Vodka, Bad Table Wine, Sake, Canadian Ice Lager and Tequila (pictured). Guess it will be a while before Jaeger-and-Redbull makes it to the BevShots microscope.
